FOR YOUR SAFETY

Hiking along the shoreline is a great way to explore the Mingan Archipelago, but please, be aware of the following risks:

Falling rocks are a hazard near the cliffs. When possible, keep a safe distance, avoid walking beneath overhanging rocks, and do not stop at the base of cliffs. Hike around low tide to stay away from the cliffs. Even with these precautions, be aware that falling rocks may sometimes be unavoidable and dangerous.

Please proceed with caution. Some areas along the shoreline may present difficult walking conditions and may cause you to fall. At low tide, water and seaweed on the rocks create slippery conditions. Hiking along the shoreline can be difficult at high tide as water may block the trail.

Admire the rock formations from the trails or the coastline. Climbing on the monoliths is dangerous and prohibited.

A CONSERVATION TEAM DEDICATED TO THE PROTECTION OF NATURAL AND CULTURAL RESOURCES

The Mingan Thistle

The Mingan thistle, an endangered species in Canada, is at the centre of conservation efforts at the Mingan Archipelago National Park Reserve. Between 2017 and 2021, conservation actions intensified: over 11 000 seeds and 500 seedlings were transplanted, in addition to numerous interventions aimed at restoring its habitat. Although the population increased from 444 plants in 2017 to 3 652 plants in 2021, the species remains at risk today. In 2025, the conservation team began a second phase of intervention, the main objectives of which will be the restoration of degraded habitats and the preservation of the genetic diversity of the species.

Spruce Budworm and Hemlock Looper

For several years, the Mingan Archipelago National Park Reserve has been affected by an epidemic of the Spruce Budworm, a native moth whose larvae mainly consume balsam fir needles in the spring. Repeated defoliation leads to a gradual weakening of trees over the years. Since 2024, a second insect, the Hemlock Looper, has been observed in the park reserve. Unlike the Budworm, this species can cause tree mortality during the year of the attack. Satellite imagery analyses indicate that in 2025, about 63% of the islands' forest area was disturbed by these outbreaks, compared to 33% in 2024. Despite their destructive nature, these disturbances contribute to the natural dynamics of forest ecosystems by promoting their regeneration.

Parks Canada tracks these natural disturbances annually while ensuring visitor safety where trees may be hazardous to the public. Despite our efforts, we encourage you to remain vigilant when hiking in the forest, as some trees may be weakened by this double epidemic.

Monitoring Common Eider and gulls in the barrens

The park reserve is home to large populations of Common Eiders and Herring and Great Black-backed Gulls, whose nesting on the barrens reflects the health of the ecosystem. An inventory carried out every ten years, from Île aux Perroquets to Île à la Chasse, makes it possible to monitor the evolution of these species. In 2025, over 3,800 eider nests and almost 1,700 gull nests were recorded there. The results of this monitoring suggest that the population of nesting eiders in the archipelago are doing well and increasing over time. However, Herring Gull and Great Black-backed Gull populations have continued to decline since 1990. The 2025 inventory, conducted by the conservation team, allows for the documentation of variations in nesting populations that are likely to be influenced by a variety of environmental factors, including predation, food availability and climate change.

THANK YOU FOR RESPECTING THIS FRAGILE AREA:

- › Use only established trails, keep to areas with no vegetation when walking along the coastline.
- › Respect the Code of Ethics for Seabird Observation and Navigation in the Mingan Archipelago.
- › Make sure to read and obey park regulations.
- › Bring your garbage back with you after your stay in the park.
- › Do not feed the wildlife.
- › Leave your drone at home.

PRESENCE OF SURVEILLANCE CAMERAS

Surveillance cameras are used in this national park reserve for wildlife conservation purposes. Are you concerned about protecting your privacy? We are too. That's why we delete visitor images taken by our cameras. However, if the images show illegal activities that may have serious impacts on wildlife or that jeopardize visitor safety, they may be used for enforcement purposes.
